A: No, once a file has been recovered, it does not come back into existence on your drive - but of course the data is still there. It is the job of the recovery software to scan the drive and point out the pieces that were deleted and where they can be found. If the data is still in the computer, the recovery software can try and open it. Most people that attempt to recover files in this way are using the Windows XP recovery tools or even the copy and paste data (CTI). They are not normally Windows 7's tools. If you have a second hard drive connected to your PC and you want to recover a file to it then I would suggest you look in the Windows XP tools directory for a program called testdisk (for finding partitions) and for the recovery tools directory for pstools. Both of these programs will list the files on your hard drive and you can decide what to do with them. Timmy, I just called Jim Martin at Enron and I asked him to get confirmation of this deal. His secretary told me that he never saw this before and couldn't send anything out until he spoke with you. I will send this to you and he will probably call you. From: Tim Belden
